About Irrigating Beets,

(Written for "The Banner.")

The questions are often asked by the farmer-"When shall I irrigate my beets? Will the sugar beet gather more saccharine matter in soil not irrigated than in irrigated soil?"

In replying to the first we would say, actual need of it, and every person who is accustomed to farming in Utah, can tell when that is-but don't put any water on as long as there is a fair supply of natural moisture in the ground; for The following important decree of the too much water is just as bad as not enough.

The sugar beet does not begin to thrive as well, and reach the full uniform size on cold undrained land, that it does on higher and dryer ground. Those who have beets in land that has been kept unusually wet by the heavy rainfall of the past spring, note how much larger and more advanced the beets on the higher spots are. Where The decree entered in this case on the there is an excess of moisture the roots 13th day of May, 1890, having been set receive sufficient nourishment without aside by an order of the court made on going as deep as they should into the the 23d day of May, 1800.
